> At the outset of the contest Democratic leaders of the Eastern and Northern States who counted upon the support of the large cities and industrial centers, thought that the "wet" and "dry" issue was destined to play a decisive part in the presidential battle.

The manifest success of the Repubstrategy, inaugurated by Na-

Re-Form Lines of Attack. The realization of what appears to be the inevitable trend of public sentiment in these sections of the country toward the Republican party, has unquestionably influenced a re-form-ing of Democratic lines of attack. The national leaders of that party have therefore responded to the cue given by Governor Cox in his recent speeches in the West, which have reflected his determination to direct his appeal to those States where the "dry" policy has either become an established institution or is finding in-Creasing favor.

The Republicans have not been slow to take advantage of this condition of affairs. For instance, Jude Miller, the Republican candidate for Governor of New York, who was regarded as "moist," has switched around to the "dry" end, leaving his Democratic opponent, Governor Smith, the sole champion of the "wet"

The Democratic managers find some comfort in the fact that Governor Cox will lose very few votes in the wet belt of the country because of the ability of the local candidates to hold them. Another source of consolation is the prospect that some of the very dry States whose views have been met by Governor Cox will give their electoral votes to him.
